Document 1
1. Cyrus Vance served in the cabinet of which former U. S. President?

2. What kind of memory did Vance's mother claim he had?

3. What qualities mentioned in the article does Vance have that likely led him to succeed in politics?

4. Describe what is happening in the cartoon. What people and objects are shown? How are they arranged? How do they relate to one another? Does anything in the reading elaborate on the meaning of the cartoon? Why or why not?

5. Do political cartoons have the ability to sway public opinion on a person or topic?

Think Critically: How do decisions on foreign affairs made by the Secretary of State and the State Department affect you? Considering Vance's period as Secretary of State, which U.S. foe would he have likely been in contact with most often? If you were the Secretary of State, how would you converse with foreign leaders? Is diplomacy your priority or a show of brute strength through your nation's military? Explain.

Vance said Davis would pose legal problems for him. Vance, who was in grade school then, would spend hours researching the problem in the law library before giving Davis his "opinion."

Many years later, such painstaking work habits attracted the attention of John F. Kennedy, who named Vance deputy defense secretary. Later, Vance became a world troubleshooter for President Johnson.

Vance was born on St. Patrick's Day in 1917, the son of John Carl and Amy Roberts Vance. The family was of Welsh descent, and Cyrus was the fourth generation of the family in Clarksburg. His great-grandfather, Cyrus Vance, had been mayor and his grandfather, John Vance, was a member of the first legislature at Wheeling, after the state split from Virginia.

Vance lived in Clarksburg only about six months before his father, an insurance executive, moved the family to Bronxville, N.Y. His father died of pneumonia when the boy was 5 years old and the family returned to Clarksburg, where Cyrus attended grade school.

But his mother later sent him to a private school in Switzerland.

"She insisted that we learn to speak French," Vance recalled. So she placed us with a Swiss family that could not speak English.

"I think this is a good example of her efforts to teach us self-reliance. It taught us to (Continued on Page 2, Col. 5)."

adapt to change."

Later Vance attended Kent School, a private prep school in Connecticut, and was graduated in 1939 from Yale University with a degree in economics. He was graduated from the Yale Law School with honors in 1942.

Vance entered government service in 1957 and served until 1960 as special counsel to the preparedness investigating subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Armed Services. He later advised the Special Senate Committee on Space and Aeronautics, chaired by then Sen. Lyndon B. Johnson, D-Texas.

Vance developed a reputation for thorough work and research while in Washington. His speed reading habits helped him to keep up with workloads that may have defeated others.

“He has a photographic memory,” said his mother. “I remember one time we took a motor trip out West. Bob had been on the same route years before — and he remembered every turn in the road before we came to it.”

Vance has been associated with a New York law firm and recently has been a ranking foreign policy adviser to Carter.

“I feel every person who has been in a position of power and/or advantage should give some thought to public service,” Vance said in a 1983 interview. “I’ve always felt very strongly that all of us have an obligation . . . . a duty to perform.”
